Josh Rasin is the Manager of Technology Acceleration at the Sacramento Municipal Utility District (SMUD), where he has worked for the last decade. He plays a key role in delivering actionable research in advanced technologies and business models to inform SMUD strategy, maintain a position of policy influence, attract external funding, and provide options to address disruptive technologies in an uncertain future. Prior to working at SMUD, he worked as a consultant to utilities, evaluating energy efficiency programs, implementing demand response research projects, and leading the team of consultants developing California's statewide building codes and standards. He holds a BA in Environmental Economics from Binghamton University.
